A close relative of the two Kumars, a young god-boy named Devdas loves Radha more than life. He does not understand her wealthy family and the unique circumstances of their relationship is forbidden by his father. Devdas meets a girl who seems to be everything he has been looking for in a partner, but when he realizes she will only love him if he gives up Radha, Devdas ultimately commits suicide in despair. This story is set against the backdrop of upper-class Hindu society from where the story takes its themes with a different perspective. Devdas is a tragic hero who sacrifices his love for the sake of his family. Devdas' father, being a staunch believer in the caste system, does not approve of Devdas marrying a woman from a lower caste like Paro. During India's independence movement, Chaudhury Sharat Chandra (Chandra), his wife Bimala ("Bimba"), and their two sons, Kishore and Dhiren, move to Calcutta from their village. Shortly after their arrival, Bimala is diagnosed with tuberculosis. When Kishore discovers that he cannot provide for Bimala due to his father's insistence of continuing to live with his family in the village, he decides to return home after Bimala has recovered. Meanwhile, Keshab makes friends with Devdas's younger brother Ashok. Ashok eventually falls in love with Paro, a widow who had once been engaged to Keshab's father Birju before she was widowed. The two fall in love but are unable to be together as Birju still lives in their village and prevents Paro from seeing Keshab as well as opposing her marriage with Ashok. They face much opposition from their families. Eventually, Devdas' father arranges for his son to marry Paro, but Devdas refuses to do so, much to Bimala's dismay.
