between the temporary and shared memory in OpenGL. Could someone please explain the difference between these and how they are used? A: Temporary storage is used for data that is passed to and returned from OpenGL functions (and that you need to delete on exiting the function). Shared memory is used for intermediate results. Most often you'll use shared memory for buffers that your OpenGL application will be using. You want to create those buffers once and then pass them to your application. You'll normally create one or more of these buffers for each object/data your application is going to use. The common scenario for
