Zobel v. Madigan , 510 U.S. 715 (1993) The first "cause of action" for which relief was sought by the plaintiffs in Zobel was that the defendant Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction had violated the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution by, among other things, failing to provide the opportunity to remediate their education deficiencies. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiffs lacked standing to sue on this claim, because the plaintiff had not shown that they had been harmed by the alleged constitutional violation. The Supreme Court also held that the Court of Appeals had improperly decided issues of state law and federal constitutional law when it concluded that the defendant's actions were not state action. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiffs had standing to sue on their claim that the defendant had violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, because the plaintiffs had showed that they had been harmed by the defendant's actions. The Supreme Court held that the Court of Appeals had erroneously held that the defendant's actions were not state action. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff school districts did not have a property right in the District's requirement that parents provide free lunches to their children, because the obligation to provide such lunches was not derived from any state-created property right to educate students. The Supreme Court noted that the defendant had taken a negative position on the claim that the plaintiff school districts had a property right to provide free lunches to their students, and that the defendant had presented no evidence to support its argument that the District's requirement to provide free lunches was reasonable. The Supreme Court held that the plaintiff school districts had no property right in the tax-exempt status of tuition reimbursements for private schools, because such tax-exempt status was not a necessary component of the District's free-lunch program. The Supreme Court held that the State of Wisconsin had not violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by granting tax-exempt status to tuition reimbursements for private schools and private tutors. The Supreme Court held that the defendant Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by granting tax-exempt status to tuition reimbursements for private schools and private tutors. The Supreme Court held that the defendant Wisconsin Department of Public Instruction did not violate the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment when it funded the plaintiff school districts' free lunch program

The Norwegian cross-country skier Marit Bjoergen won gold in the first two-women cross-country skiing events, while biathlete Julia Mancuso took gold in the inaugural women's biathlon, beating out fellow American biathlete Breezy Mead. Germany, France and Norway will be set to compete in the event as well. In an interview with the International Olympic Committee (IOC), Swedish biathlete Andreas Küng stated that, "This is the first time we will hold a cross-country skiing event in the games and we want to hold a medal-event in the event. We are eager to see how the skiing fans in our country will take to the event." Speaking of Nordic skiing fans in general, Skiing magazine spoke to Nordic skiing fans in Sweden who spoke of a very limited knowledge of the sport, but had an immediate affinity for the sport. When it comes to the women's biathlon, the magazine also spoke to fans of the sport who stated that "they were 2d92ce491b
