Improvement of clinical outcomes by early extubation of patients undergoing non-cardiac surgery. The primary objective of this study was to evaluate the effect of early extubation after non-cardiac surgery in a large volume coronary care unit in terms of changes in the postoperative blood pressure, heart rate, and incidence of pulmonary complications. As a secondary objective, we aimed to identify factors that could predict the risk for re-intubation and length of stay in the ICU. This was a retrospective chart review conducted at a medium volume coronary care unit. All patients who were extubated within 24 h after surgery were included. Of all patients, 1678 were eligible for the study. Extubation was not performed in 22.8% due to severe comorbidities. In the remaining patients, extubation was performed in 75.2%, and 67.2% were successfully extubated after surgery. There were no differences in patients' characteristics between those who were successfully and unsuccessfully extubated, except in the proportion of patients with pulmonary hypertension, who were significantly more frequent among the failed extubation group. The incidence of acute myocardial infarction, acute coronary syndrome, cardiac failure, atrial fibrillation, and re-intubation did not differ significantly between the successful and the failed extubation group. Mechanical ventilation for more than 24 h, postoperative bleeding, and re-intubation were each independently associated with increased risk for re-intubation. None of these variables were significantly associated with ICU stay. In conclusion, this study demonstrated that early extubation after non-cardiac surgery is feasible in a large volume coronary care unit.
