This invention relates to a new and useful method of inhibiting the aggregation of particles of hydrophilic materials in aqueous suspensions. The method is especially applicable to the stabilization of starch granules in aqueous starch slurries in paper making and in industrial starch slurries. Starch slurries are often treated to cause the starch granules to swell, granulate or agglomerate. In paper making these treatments are applied in order to facilitate the dispersion of starch, especially in so-called base grades, for example, in order to improve the drainage and tensile strength and to improve the printability of the paper sheet. To prevent the formation of starch agglomerates in paper making, there are used, for example, starch dispersants or dispersing aids which generally are surface active agents. The term "surface active agent" as used herein includes surface active agents generally used in the art and includes nonionic, cationic, anionic and amphoteric surface active agents, the term "nonionic" being preferred. In particular, the term "nonionic" includes the so-called aliphatic alcohol ethoxylates (polyethylene glycol ethers), the so-called aliphatic alcohol ethoxypolyethoxyethylene glycol ethers (polyoxyethylene fatty alcohol ethers), and the so-called aliphatic alcohol carboxy polyalkoxylates (polyalkylene glycol carboxylic acids). The term "nonionic" also includes the so-called aliphatic alcohol polyalkylene glycol ether sulfates (polyethylene glycol alkyl ether sulfates), the so-called alcohol
