Prosthetic devices to replace the interphalangeal and metacarpophalangeal joints of the human hand, for example, have been known and used for many years. In more recent years, these devices have taken on a number of different shapes and forms. Early prosthetic devices were primarily cylindrical or spherical. For example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 2,768,254 and 2,802,476 disclose prosthetic devices that are essentially cylindrical. Later prosthetic devices, however, have taken on other shapes. For example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 5,085,593 and 4,964,858 disclose interproximal ring prostheses of a generally rectangular configuration. The fabrication of such devices is typically complicated and the inner surfaces thereof are of such a configuration that they may cause the joint to move in an unnatural manner. More recently, efforts have been made to develop a modular prosthetic device which can be assembled or disassembled by the patient to best fit his or her particular needs. U.S. Pat. No. 5,366,492, for example, discloses a modular prosthetic device which includes an upper member and a lower member and a locking mechanism which may be adjusted by the patient. The locking mechanism is mounted on the lower member and includes a screw which is moved to different positions within the lower member to accommodate various lower member lengths. The upper member is configured so as to receive the lower member and the locking mechanism in various angular arrangements to accommodate various lower member lengths. Thus, the prosthetic device of the '492 patent enables a wide range of upper member lengths to be accommodated. In one preferred embodiment of the '492 patent, the upper member includes a finger shank or blade which has two spaced sets of protuberances or teeth, with the protuberances on one set being oriented to interlock with the protuberances on the other set. The set of protuber
