The first one is the so-called standard recording, which works in such a way that the entire screen is sent to the clipboard, regardless of whether it is a background task. The second method is capture-on-demand. In this mode, you can select the areas on the screen that you wish to capture (or not), choosing between the various recording methods, such as app-by-app, full screen, window, rectangle and pixel-by-pixel. You can also select the area of the screen to be captured, and you can select capture only the area that is visible on the screen. A number of additional parameters can be configured in DSR. For example, you can choose whether to record the computer's audio as well, and you can also choose the format for the recorded video (also limited to JPG, BMP, GIF and PNG). When it comes to the interface, DSR has a rather minimalistic look. The interface is based on a rectangular window with a tabbed control bar on top and a back button on the right side. The settings window (accessible via the main interface) contains four tabs: Basic, Recording, Settings and History. The first one allows you to change the recording mode, select the duration of the recording (by default the recording will stop when it is over), select the format for the recording, select the output folder and choose what action should be taken when recording is interrupted. The second one allows you to select and configure various recording modes (full screen, window, app-by-app, pixel-by-pixel, etc.), select the capturing area, select the time format for the recorded video and select the format of the captured images. The Settings tab allows you to set options such as auto-replay, capturing audio (in all available audio devices), background screen capture (if enabled), as well as other options that are specific to this mode. The History tab allows you to view information about all previous recordings. These recordings appear
