People tell me that they want to buy shoes at the end of the season for the following year, but they never seem to find any reasonable offers. Why? It's hard to keep track of what stock is in and what stock is out at the end of the season and it's hard to persuade retailers to think about autumn stock, and then to make an offer at the end of the season. But retailers who do so can make a lot of money. Manufacturers and retailers might feel reluctant to make offers at the end of the season because of the uncertainty about what demand will be in the following year. In addition, the increase in stock at the end of the season is such a big reduction from previous year demand that retailers may feel this reduces their profit margins. One common way of coping with this problem is to make offers early in the year, before demand is known, and then to revise these offers up or down to reflect the subsequent demand. This technique works well if the prices of the shoes are going to be affected by the market as a whole. For example, if the demand for a particular model of shoe is fairly stable, a manufacturer could keep prices low in the first part of the year to attract demand in the summer. Once demand for the shoe has been established, the manufacturer could increase the price of the shoe to reflect that the market demand is higher. This can be a problem if the demand for a particular shoe fluctuates a lot. Retailers who are willing to take a chance on a new model of shoe in the first part of the year may lose money if they don't sell enough of the new model of shoe. Retailers who don't make any money at the beginning of the year are unlikely to take a chance on the model of shoe. Solutions to this problem will vary from one industry
