I'm a graduate student in the U.S. I was recently asked to be a referee for a paper that was revised for the "SRTI" (Special Issue of the journal Techno-Economic Literature) on Scientific Research and Theory Innovation (STI). I was asked to review two papers, which have the same name but different year of publication. The paper I was asked to review is from the year 1999, while the other paper is from the year 2006. The papers are essentially identical. The only difference is the quantity of published papers that have been published since the papers appeared in the STI. The paper I was asked to review has fewer than five published papers while the paper I was not asked to review has approximately 20. I found this odd, but only briefly because I was too busy with my own thesis. Well, after reviewing the paper, I had some questions about the quality of the paper that the thesis authors conducted. I emailed the authors of the paper asking them to address some of the issues I raised in my review. I also wanted to know if there were any updates in the literature since 1999. The authors answered my email and I know that I gave them a lot of credit. However, my review was rejected. I was told that their review had a lot of deficiencies that I pointed out and I was unable to address. I was also told that my review was a bit too short and should be longer (if possible
