Photoshop is available for many different platforms, including Windows, Mac OS X, and even Linux. However, because of the powerful features of Photoshop, it has been largely associated with Mac OS X. Adobe Photoshop Lightroom is available for Mac OS X. It is an easy-to-use, image-based software package for organizing, editing, and printing images. Apple provides tutorials for getting started with Lightroom to help you get the most from the software. For more information, visit www.adobe.com/uk/products/photoshoplightroom.html. In this chapter, you learn all about: Layers The Photoshop Image Window and the Layers Panel Using the menu tools Using the keyboard and a ruler Manipulating bitmap layers Using alpha channels Merging layers Using selections Drawing and erasing Applying filters and adjustments Making corrections Saving a document Mastering Photoshop Elements Understanding Layers A layer is a group of pixels, or tiny squares of colors, that you are able to modify independently of each other on a computer screen. A layer contains a set of instructions that tells Photoshop what to do with that layer. By grouping or arranging the various layers in different ways, you can create a finished, organized image file. In traditional image editing, the layers are often visible, and you can see what is being done to each layer as you go. In Photoshop, however, layers are a lot more than just a simple hide-show feature. You can have multiple layers for any one image, and you can also have multiple layers for any image or document. Let's start with some basic concepts for layers.

First, a single image can have any number of layers. Second, each of these layers (layers 0 through 9) are organized in front of each other in order by depth. In other words, the bottom most layer is on top and in front of the next layer and so on. Only the currently active layer is visible. The rest of the layers are all on top of the currently active layer and cannot be seen. Working with a single layer If you open a document with multiple layers and nothing is in the active layer, like so: You end up with an image that looks like this: You can merge layers by clicking on the Layer button in the Layers Panel and then selecting Merge or Merge Down.

to get those images looking really sharp and focused. So this Photoshop tutorial will show you how to do just that. Open up a new file into Photoshop and let's get started. This photo is very warm with lots of color, it's a little bit of a miniature image that, some of you may not see. When I open it up with the image tool, you can see the tiny image. So let's resize it so that we can see all the detail that's there. Resize it to about 200 pixels and then fit the canvas. And I'm going to change the color. I'm going to use white. I'm going to make it black and white. Let's turn off Screen mode, which is there so that I can crop the image and you can see exactly what I'm doing.

I'm going to crop the image and I have this preset way of cropping in Photoshop. But it's only best fit. So I'll use crop to fit the width and height. And then I'll take it back down to 100 pixels. And this image is in the crop frame so I'll crop it. Resize it to 100. And then take the little crop stamp back to 50 pixels. And it's now an exact crop, it's cropped it into 50. So we can see exactly what we're doing. So this will be the first of a few steps. Let's actually get the image a bit sharper.

Right click, enhance, adjust, brightness and contrast. And what we'll do is we'll darken the darkness and lighten up the highlights, just a little bit. And then we'll go to this darker area. Darker and brighter. Let's do it with 30,000 for the brightness. And then we'll go to 10,000 for the contrast. And we'll go to the darkest image that we can get. And we'll brighten it a little bit. Let's brighten it and then darken it a little bit more. And finally, we'll brighten it some more. And it will have 05a79cecff

House Votes to Slash Funding for Seattle Police Department Elderly people crossing a major road outside a social care center in New Walk in Stratford, East London. (Picture: Danny Lawson/PA Wire) By Emma Burnell The House of Commons has voted to slash over £400 million from the budget of police forces in England and Wales, as the Home Secretary Theresa May revealed that police numbers are predicted to fall by 30,000. The budget reduction, the biggest in a decade, will have a significant impact on crime prevention by slashing funding for local crime prevention and homelessness. Violence in the community has risen in recent years, including homicides, assaults, rapes, robberies and burglaries. The number of police officers working in England and Wales has fallen by around 30,000 in the last 12 years. The Home Secretary told MPs: “We recognise the essential nature of the police and the need for them to work well together across a range of public protection, criminal justice and family support issues. “We are looking carefully at the effects on police numbers of the current financial climate, particularly in view of the proposed cuts to the Home Office budget. However, we will not hesitate to make further reductions if police numbers are insufficient in the long term to deliver effective policing.” Responding to the proposal, Peter McVerry, President of the Police Superintendents’ Association (PSA), said: “Given the severe and unprecedented budget cuts already imposed on police forces in England and Wales, I believe that the Home Secretary’s statement is an unhelpful contribution to policing, police confidence, and public safety. “The policing profession is already facing a significant and unprecedented challenge, with unprecedented levels of violence in our communities and a rapidly changing threat environment. As new threats emerge on the horizon, the policing profession will be even more stretched in the coming years. “Lasting and meaningful cuts would not only undermine police confidence in the job we do, it would also hinder the effectiveness of the police, the police community and the frontline communities we serve. We urge the government to cancel these cuts and work with us to develop an agreed plan to improve police numbers.” The PSA, whose members include chief superintendents, assistant superintendents, inspectors, and general superintendents, represents the UK’s 33,400 police officers, their officers and staff. The Association,
