Otherwise, we strongly recommend Easy GIF Animator to all users. Woosh. Manually opening a file that's not even there. Problem. Worse. Buying software that's already in the app store? Buttons that are so huge that I can barely fit a finger in between them. To sum it up Awkward and plain. Easy GIF Animator also has a paid pro version, which is necessary, but there's no need to pay for an entire app just to create a GIF animation. This app is the ultimate tool for gif producers. Easy GIF Animator Pros High-quality results. Isolate the GIF animator. It isn't part of the browser and you won't have any unnecessary clutter. You can rotate any animated GIF. Worth your while. A feature-rich application for creating and editing animated GIF images in just a few simple steps. Create animated GIF banners for the web, posters, presentations, individual photos, animation for social networks, Yahoo! Buzz, Vimeo, etc., as well as animated buttons on your own site. System Requirements: • Windows 98/ME/NT/2000/XP/Vista/Win7 • Windows 95/98/Me/2000/XP/Vista • 1 GB of available hard drive space • 512 MB of RAMQ: Is the output of this monad is same when we can infer True from it? I have the following function: `f :: MonadPlus m => m Bool -> m Bool f (Just True) = Just False f (Just False) = Just True f (Nothing) = Nothing` Given this monad, the output of this function is just False for any monad m. Is there a way to infer True from this output? I mean, without actually executing this function, can we say that it does not matter what we pass to this function, the output of the monad will be Just False? A: Sure, that's not a function in the normal sense, it's a function of the "type" of the output. But if it was a function, to your hypothetical person it would have the type `bool bool` or something like that, and that's a function that you should be able to infer true from. For some reason this doesn't work though, the Haskell type checker doesn't let you use this function without erroring out: `*Main> let f x = Just (f x) in f $ Just True :40:17: error: • Couldn't match type 'Bool' with 'Bool' Expected type: MonadPlus m => m Bool Actual type: Bool In the second argument of 'f', namely '$ Just True' • In the first argument of '($)', namely 'f $ Just True' In the expression: f $ Just True` The "type checker" that GHC is using
