A brief history of Photoshop Almost one year ago, Adobe announced the launch of Photoshop CC, which is the latest version of its famous Photoshop image editing software and is one of the most powerful desktop photo editing software. Not only has Photoshop CC become popular, many photographers as well as graphic designers rely on it to finish their projects. The idea of Photoshop was created in the late 1980s by two young photographers, Chuck Forsman and John Knoll. They worked with an early version of Microsoft's Windows 3.11 operating system and were inspired to develop a user interface with a friendly and simple design. In the beginning, Photoshop was just a revolution for desktop publishing. It allowed users to make modifications such as retouching and compositing images. In 1992, Photoshop won the EFF Pioneer Award. The award is given to honor the people whose work has positively influenced the way digital information is disseminated and distributed. Today, Photoshop is an industry standard, much like Microsoft Windows is for many of us in this world. Creative professionals are often paid to use Photoshop for their projects. Racial differences in clinical responses to growth hormone therapy in children with short stature. The clinical responses to growth hormone (GH) therapy and the relationship between growth response and genotype were studied in 137 children with short stature. Forty-seven of the patients were of white European origin and 90 were of non-white (black, Asian or Middle Eastern) origin. During GH therapy the mean (SD) height velocity (HV) increased by 9.6 (1.4) cm/year in white children and 7.2 (1.2) cm/year in non-white children. The average height increment per year was similar in both races, despite the fact that the white children had a greater initial mean height SDS (-2.0 (0.8) vs -3.3 (0.8)). White children had greater (P Q: how to wrap a bunch of bytes? A mysterious new campaign, for some reason called Rainbow Nachos, is up to its third prank: Donations to a former child pornographer have gone to a group that wants to get school districts to teach "intolerance," and oppose Chick-fil-A based on the company's founder's anti-gay marriage views. Whoever started the campaign was first playing with a group called "Nachovision"—a reference to a porno channel that often plays to flashing neon colors over the images. They then made the Tumblr account /r/RainbowNachos—which says it's a campaign funded by a hacker group called Anonymous. But it's definitely a prank. A recent entry there claims to be "a full-blown invasion." Now, true believers say that they're actually funding a grassroots campaign, "a new environmental website called EcoWatch.org," and trying to raise money for animal rights. That's an odd grouping, but some of the people behind EcoWatch do support gay rights, as we noted here. A bit of Googling turned up that EcoWatch was founded by journalist and author Matt Nisbet, who also founded Equity, a group that opposes homophobia in schools. But Nisbet's blog posts from the past few years—like this one in July—seem to suggest that he's opposed to gay marriage, not anti-gay. So, one thing's clear: whoever started Rainbow Nachos is clearly trying to pull the wool over people's eyes. But here's another question: who's benefiting from the jokes? One commenter on the Rainbow Nachos campaign says, "This tweet is cool and all but it is also a pretty big favor to the author and the website EcoWatch.org, they need all the money they can get if they want to survive." That's an interesting comment. "Nachovision," which has a new post on the Rainbow Nachos campaign, says, "We're your new media, your new controversy, your new Easter egg,◆
