To evaluate whether selective fetal reduction impacts the risk of cesarean delivery. Retrospective cohort study. All singleton pregnancies at a high-risk unit for fetal demise who had undergone selective fetal reduction (eSET) between November 1, 2007, and December 30, 2013. The main outcome measure was the risk of cesarean delivery before 37 weeks' gestation. The secondary outcome was the risk of cesarean delivery before 37 weeks' gestation after the first eSET. A total of 219 women who had undergone elective fetal reduction during singleton pregnancies for a fetal demise were included, of whom 182 delivered vaginally and 37 delivered by cesarean before 37 weeks' gestation. The number needed to treat to prevent one cesarean delivery before 37 weeks' gestation was 50 (95% confidence interval, 42-61). The cesarean delivery rates were significantly lower after the first and second eSETs. The risk of cesarean delivery at 37 weeks' gestation was very low after the first eSET (1.4% [3/209]). Elective fetal reduction for a lethal fetal anomaly is associated with a low risk of cesarean delivery before 37 weeks' gestation and a prompt decline in the cesarean delivery rate before 37 weeks' gestation. Selective reduction of a lethal fetal anomaly before the start of labor is associated with a low risk of cesarean delivery. No benefits of using elective fetal reduction for a lethal fetal anomaly can be excluded by the results of this study.
