Physical and psychological attributes of the players are accurately recreated to add to the sense of realism and excitement of the game. These include, but are not limited to: acceleration/deceleration times, speed, jumping height, jump distance, top speed, power, jumping/stopping distance, tackling, reaction times, reaction distance, tackle stability, height and weight. Taking human variability and precision of motion into account, every player in the game will behave differently on the pitch. A player will accelerate differently on one ball compared to another, whilst a player may stop differently depending on how their feet get tangled up with another player. There is also a greater range of acceleration and deceleration reactions for dribblers, causing them to be more unpredictable and difficult to predict. Combinations of movement and power can also be introduced, allowing the AI to generate more realistic and entertaining gameplay. Additionally, each player class has its own distinct behaviours and skills as well as their own characteristics. For example, a player class who excels at stamina may burn themselves out quickly, while a player class who is good at short, precise passing may struggle to create space for themselves.

“HyperMotion™ adds a deeper dimension to the physicality of the game. It allows us to extend that feeling of immersion, by giving players the ability to think and behave like the best footballers in the world,” said Silvester Mornhinweg, FIFA Lead Gameplay Designer. “With the rise of goal-line technology, we wanted to capture the unpredictability of the world’s best strikers. The FIFA franchise is renowned for its realism, and we are confident the addition of HyperMotion technology will make FIFA 22 the very best football simulation on the market.” This trailer gives you a hint of what FIFA 22 gameplay is going to look like at launch: FIFA 22 will be available on PS4 and Xbox One on September 27.
