In three mongrel dogs, an external biliary drainage device consisting of a double-lumen nasobiliary tube was implanted in the proximal part of the common bile duct to establish a biliary cirrhosis. The efficacy of the functional adaptation of the small liver after chronic biliary obstruction was evaluated by serial portal venous pressure measurements, oximetry, and analysis of hepatic functional parameters. The porto-systemic venous pressure gradient increased significantly from a control value of 5.2 +/- 1.2 mmHg to 18.3 +/- 6.3 mmHg after 2 weeks of biliary drainage. Oxygen consumption of the liver, oxygen content in the liver, and liver blood flow increased after 2 weeks of biliary drainage. It is concluded that chronic biliary obstruction leads to hyperperfusion of the liver accompanied by an increased oxygen utilization. This observation is consistent with the finding of hyperperfusion and hyperoxygenation of the liver in patients with biliary tract obstruction.Semiconductor device fabrication may include depositing a semiconducting, metal, or dielectric layer on a semiconducting substrate or wafer.
