In MUGEs, two players, or even more players, can have fun together, by each choosing the actions to be carried out by the characters of these players. In general, in MUGEs, a game takes place in an interactive virtual environment, presented to the players as text or a graphical representation. The game is composed of a game world, and of a series of events which trigger the actions that the players undertake in the world. The actions carried out by the players of the game enable the transition of the game world to another state. In many MUGEs, the game is structured into a predetermined sequence of phases, each of which is associated with a certain game environment and triggers actions, or makes it possible to carry out certain actions. For example, as illustrated in FIG. 1, a first phase 100 is followed by a second phase 102. The first phase 100 can be associated with a first game environment, whereas the second phase 102 can be associated with a second game environment. The transitions between the phases are controlled by certain events which can be activated by players, or by the environment. The ability of being able to intervene, by way of actions, on the game world in order to carry out a change in the state thereof, gives MUGEs a degree of realism that is not possible with the conventional games. Indeed, the player, by acting on the game world, can force a change in the game situation according to his/her wishes, rather than depending on the automatic succession of the successive phases. However, even though the intervention of the players via the game world is useful in restoring the game to a state that is according to their wishes, it is detrimental in some cases. Indeed, players may wish to play the game using characters having features that are different from those of the characters used by other players. In the prior art, one way of providing such a possibility 648931e174
