The membrane electrical properties of rat cerebellar Purkinje cells (PCs) have been studied using multielectrode and current-clamp techniques. These cells were initially isolated under voltage-clamp conditions and allowed to equilibrate for a period of 30 minutes in Ca²⁺-free medium (3.5 mM MgSO₄). During this incubation period, the PCs' membrane potential was maintained at approximately -55 mV, their input resistance was 11.5 +/- 1.9 M ohm, their action potential duration at 90% repolarization (APD₉₀) was 24 +/- 0.1 msec, and their rheobase was 32 +/- 5.5 pA. After the PCs had been allowed to equilibrate in Ca²⁺-free solution for 30 minutes, the PCs were exposed to a phorbol ester derivative for 60 minutes. The effects of these treatments on the PCs' membrane potential, input resistance, and action potential duration were evaluated. Brief applications of phorbol ester (1-100 nM), induced a concentration-dependent hyperpolarization in PCs, which consisted of a rapid and transient component. When the PCs were exposed to phorbol es
