The official announcement from EA: “As gamers, we’re all accustomed to graphics bringing our virtual worlds to life, but there is something special about how realistic players move and interact in FIFA. Our goal has always been to create the most authentic experience possible, and thanks to the technology and support of our partners like Shape Dynamics, we are excited to offer gamers a new level of physics and animation as we introduce HyperMotion Technology into FIFA. Whether you’re in-stadium or online, we’ve worked hard to make this the most realistic football simulation we have ever created, using the newest results from the research and development we’ve been conducting. We’ve reimaged our animation system, enhanced the artificial intelligence, improved the ball physics, perfected our visuals and looked closely at our physics, all to create the most realistic ever version of FIFA. In addition, we created all-new camera controls, control of the ball has never been so intuitive, and we've recreated the experience of playing offline and online in the most realistic way possible, paving the way for online as a serious eSports competitor. We've worked on a new composite player animation system that has benefited from the most advanced technology and data available. The result is a three-dimensional engine that boasts the most realistic, high-intensity movements as well as lower-intensity, fluid motions that create moments of spectacular action. Now, just as in real life, there is no place a player can move without posing a threat. Using a player's every physical movement, it is possible to predict every path of play he will take, and deliver the intelligent fouls that will maximize the outcome of every challenge. We have also improved physical decisiveness for all players, and the results of contact are more unpredictable for both attackers and defenders. It's the closest we've ever come to truly intelligent refereeing, and that comes from the data collected during real-life matches. Online – with all of this new technology – is an absolute dream come true. The result is the greatest connection of online gameplay we’ve ever seen, and it can be found in stadiums, small towns or large cities. In addition to new physical animations, players move and act like they are on the field, providing the ultimate FIFA experience for players of all skill levels. We’ve improved all aspects of
